Heinrich Hermann Basse
in Mühle Holtensen near Weetzen, Hann.

Stiffening Cross for Doors and Other Wood Boards

Patented in Germany from June 19, 1912 on

To prevent buckling and deformation of doors and other wood boards, plane crosses were inlaid into the door. According to this invention, the stiffening cross should not be plane; rather, its arms must slope into the door surface.

Drawing 1 shows a stiffened door, according to this invention, without a frame. Drawing 2 shows a cut in the A-B plane. Drawings 3 and 4 show details of the crossover of the two arms.

The stiffening of the door or board is brought about by fitting the two crossing beams into the door and into the corners of a frame, while a filling piece is inserted at the crossover at point a to serve as an expansion wedge.

Claim:

A stiffening cross for doors and other wood boards characterized in that the strengthening is due to two cross beams encased in the corners of a frame while a filling piece at the crossover serves as an expansion wedge.

Section 6. Concise Explanation of English Language Listed Information Items
